Lawyering Roger D. Hatcher

A couple of Attorneys from the bottom of the attorney food chain decide to form a partnership. Each one looking to take advantage however they could of each other. Then they make the mistake of hiring an honest man to work for them. A really intelligent honest man who's idealistic enough to think attorneys should do things like represent their clients first and steal from each other later. Machiavelli's head would have spun at the energy these Attorneys expend while they try to fleece their clients, their employees and each other. With lots of money involved the only question that seems to matter to them is who's going to wind up with it. After all, that's what lawyering is really all about... being the last one standing with money in your pockets?
