Since the days of Nikola Tesla free energy has been invented and reinvented. These were the days before electrical engineering principles were solidified into a set of rules that assumed all was known. Then, inventors could think outside of a box that had not yet been formed.

There are fraudsters today who trade on our great desire to be free of the yoke of the ever-present electrical distribution systems, the burning of dirty fossil fuels, and the misery caused by such a large proportion of our earnings supporting energy. We'd all like electric cars running on free energy, or a house that drew its electricity from the vacuum, or anti-gravity and improved health.

Yes, some of these inventors declare not just free energy but anti-gravity and healthier bodies!

Can it be possible that these great developments are present today? Or are their alleged developments simply more fraudulent acts of suppressive personalities?

Herein we debunk the debunkers and describe a number of free energy machines that draw energy from the vacuum. We also present Ret. Lt. Col. Bearden's crystal clear explanations on an expansion of physics into a realm that few electrical engineers would trod, but where modern physicists have long ago walked.

John Bedini's mechanisms for free energy have been built again and again by more than 200 people, including this author. It works exactly as he has described.

We also show a few of the summaries Gary Vesperman has consolidated in his "130 Electrical Energy Innovations."

While debating the pros and cons of free energy, also ask yourself how it happens that the U.S. Patent Office, which shirks way-out ideas, has allowed 5,000 free energy devices to be patented -- and then was ordered to classify them as security risks so that no one else, including their inventors, could develop them further?
